This invention relates to video surveillance systems and more particularly to a method and system for detecting unauthorized access to cameras attached to a monitored environment. Modern surveillance systems include a number of cameras with the ability to transmit images, obtained from a monitored area, to security stations located remotely from the cameras. Surveillance systems of this type are generally used to monitor sensitive areas such as bank vaults and nuclear power plants. They also detect threats such as explosives and unauthorized personnel. In security systems of this type, security personnel must distinguish between images of normal activity and images of an alarm status. To this end, surveillance cameras, in some known systems, are subject to only a single trigger condition. If
