Surviving Mars is set in a future where humanity has reached a point of technological singularity where we are becoming a single hivemind. Our sole method of colonising is by terraforming planets and exploiting their resources. But our first venture into space will be to the Red Planet, Mars. Your role is to build your empire and terraform Mars into a livable planet, choosing how you want to live in a wide selection of unique Residential Domes and what resources you want to exploit. You are free to build anything you can dream of, but all forms of mining and production are restricted to a set of buildings and visual styles you choose before landing. Exploration is a key aspect of Surviving Mars. While there is currently no way to know what is out there, "no one knows what's there, until they look and see," says MercurySteam, "by combining a robust exploration strategy with the freedom to build anything, you will be able to discover your perfect world for yourself." The game is in early access and will be released on Steam Early Access in summer 2017, with a full release planned for October 2017. Developed by Irish indie studio MercurySteam, Surviving Mars is a no-nonsense game of survival and resource management in a future where Earth is dying and humanity has spread out into the solar system. In Surviving Mars, a group of colonists bravely head to Mars, a planet previously settled by an alien race and terraformed for a sustainable environment. Earth's only hope for survival is for you to build a successful colony and thrive on the red planet.

This is a two player game. The controls are symmetrical, so either player can play. The game has three game modes: Single player: Play a level. While it is possible to skip levels, it is usually advisable to play a level through in order to get better. Two player: Share a level. Play a level together in which one player controls the blocks and the other controls the spaces. Each of you does not have to share controls, but it is sometimes easier to coordinate your movements by sharing a control. Please read the instructions for this mode carefully, as it is a different game than the single player mode. Multiplayer: Play a level together. Choose whether the controls will be shared or not. If sharing controls, then you both have to share them. This has the effect of the game being symmetrical for both of you. In later levels of the game, blocks become more flexible in their groupings. In some levels a new form of group is used that allows for even more flexibility than the original blocks, while in other levels the blocks act a little more like bricks and some do not have any kind of flexible grouping. BRDG has eight different colors of blocks. Unfortunately, some blocks (such as the space ones) cannot be used in the first levels of the game, but they become available later. There are 28 levels in the game, plus one bonus level that is not part of the single player levels. As you progress through the game, you are granted access to more levels, but also given up access to earlier levels. The additional bonus level (level 28) is not required to complete the game. You can play and finish it without having completed any of the previous levels. The level will not be given credit for your high scores. How to play? The instructions are included with the game. You can also play the game by using the controls that are presented to you when the game is running. This includes a gamepad support, but it is not yet fully configurable. If you can not configure it, it will attempt to control the game using a combination of keyboard controls and gamepad settings. The game does not have an in-game help system. There is a hint button (H) that will allow you to use the hint provided after each level. A cheat file (on a CD-Rom or DVD) can be created that will allow you to skip levels in the game. The file can be created with
