Showing the point of no return: study of patients with schizophrenia and other spectrum disorders. The assessment of no return is important when addressing the question of whether an intervention should be applied immediately or only when the point of no return is reached. We investigate how well standard clinical assessment practices and specific insight variables identify the no return point. Two hundred and seventy participants of the Nuremberg Psychotherapy Study (63% of the eligible sample) were given a battery of measures consisting of four self-report questionnaires, two single-item questionnaires, and an interview measure.

The point of no return of the mean total score of the self-report measures and the interview was estimated. Participants were considered to have poor insight if they scored at or below the median of the interview. Standard clinical assessment measures such as the Brief Psychiatric Rating Scale (BPRS) and the Scale for the Assessment of Negative Symptoms (SANS) indicated awareness of symptoms or social skills at a significantly later stage of the illness than the interview. Several aspects of insight were significantly correlated with the estimated point of no return. Knowledge of the no return point of patients can be obtained through the addition of insight questions to rating scales. The different scales combined in this study showed a larger variety of insights in comparison with any single measure.
